PUBLIC POLICY (from the developed NASPA Public Policy Agenda Approved Fall 2012)

Student Success and College Completion

A clear consensus has emerged among higher education leaders, policy officials, the philanthropic community, and business interests that by the end of the decade some form of postsecondary education will be a requirement for the majority of the nation’s jobs. At its core, the student success and college completion agenda is built on the twin pillars of increasing student access and ensuring student success; both are required to meet labor market and citizenship requirements of the 21st century.

NASPA is committed to supporting public and institutional policies that seek to expand access to high-quality postsecondary education, and that ensure campus cultures are committed to demonstrating learning and personal development.

Issues Related to Undocumented Students

As educators who work with students every day and are committed to core values that include diversity and access, student affairs practitioners across the country are actively engaged with undocumented students who have made a choice to pursue their education. Yet due to their immigration status, academically prepared undocumented students frequently do not attend college, and those who do attend face numerous financial challenges given their limited access to most state and federal financial aid programs. Additionally, undocumented students are often at-risk of being underserved by institutions they attend, and may underutilize resources that exist to support their educational progress.

In response to this environment, NASPA is committed to providing educational programs and services to help members navigate the undocumented student policy landscape; to supporting individuals interested in becoming involved in advocacy work on their campuses; and to educating student leaders and others on how to engage community, state, and national policy dialogues related to undocumented students.

Cost of and Funding for Higher Education

Public discussion of college costs, student debts, funding for higher education, and institutional accountability involve students and families, institutional leaders, and public decision-makers. Although solutions have thus far been elusive, there is broad agreement that rising college costs threaten access, deter completion, and are unsustainable over the long run. Moreover, it is evident that pressures on state and federal budgets are calling into question the sustainability of historic higher education funding models.

To address cost, funding, and accountability issues, NASPA will join efforts to influence policies designed to increase affordability for students; will make constructive contributions to discussions about measures of accountability to ensure relevancy and transparency for students and institutional leaders; and will monitor the design of effective pathways to postsecondary degrees, with particular emphasis on the role of online education providers and community colleges. In all areas, NASPA supports cost-conscious approaches to funding and budgeting that maintain a focus on student learning and impactful student supports.
